Dollar for dollar...

Dollar for dollar is an obsolete term that no longer applies to a transaction involving the small-sized U. S. note or silver certificate. They have survived the buck-passing stage and must assume their role as collectors' items worth much more than their outward appearance would indicate.

Collectors believe that a piece of currency reaches an almost sacred dimension the very moment it is retired, and this is true. Just recently the U. S. Treasury Department issued a notice of discontinuance of the two-dollar bill because it was not a popular denomination. Immediately the two-dollar bill became extinct as far as general circulation was concerned a rim with rays, a spiked rim and scallops. It may be used in two or three different sizes and six colors: red, brown, blue, green, gold or yellow.

The legend on the seal reads: "THE SAUR * AMER * SEP-TENT * SIGIL." Translated it means: "The Seal of the Treasury of North America," a statement framed at a time when it was hoped Canada would become a part of the United States.
